

Editor's Note

There is a saying that when you are happy, time flies. It seems that when you are hard-pressed, time also flies, like when sitting for an exam, or processing certain manuscripts for publication with a degree of acceptability in our journal.

Another well-known saying is that quality and quantity have an inverse relationship — as one goes up, the other goes down. We found this to be true, again in processing papers for publication. For a small journal like ours, we opt for quality, no matter what happens.

Lastly, it is an established fact that a plan and real action rarely go together. That also applies to us when planning to increase the number of good published articles — the opposite even seems to occur actually. For a journal whose editors are almost entirely permanent lecturers, we have found that it is next to impossible to do so. Again, we prefer to stick to quality with at least a degree of acceptability.
