

Editor's Note

The upkeep of the standard of a journal is a major and time-consuming job. At Maejo, however, we are willing to go to the extremes to do that kind of job. In trying to maintain the standards of an international journal, we subject every submitted article to a series of screening that may sometimes be inconvenient or plain unpleasant to a fair number of authors, to whom we sincerely apologise. As a matter of fact, some of their complaints have had a role in shaping several of our journal's policies which will better serve future contributors. In so far as the language and academic standards of an article are not compromised, we thank them for their candid comments and always welcome more contributions from them.
